"THE MAGAZINE OF WINGED ANTIPATHY"

"I cannot for the life of me see what they see in it... creeping around whispering to each other, scribbling on those little slips of paper, pushing those colored blocks around and laughing and screaming and rubbing their hands like a bunch of little children! My husband says it's a kind of therapy, a catharsis that allows him to release all his pent-up frustrations and wicked desires. Hrrmmmp... he's so grouchy after losing a game that nobody can talk to him for days."

sTab is a (usually) bi-weekly mail Diplomacy journal, currently chronicling Games 1964D (Trantor I -- Winter 1910), 1965E (Massif -- Spring 1906), and 1965U (Trantor II -- Spring 1902). Subscriptions to sTab are 10/$1 from John Koning.

This issue does not feature the YUDC-Scarborough game, since John Smythe has not finished stenciling it. We offer instead a 5 man game played without Italy and Germany, but with one of the YUDC variations added. We will feature, in future issues, 5- and 6-man games played under the suggested Calhamar revisions for such games, in addition to 7-man contests. Charles Wells' visit here today provided several additional games to be seen in future sTabs.

FRENCH IN VENICE

LEIPZIG(AP) Army Group HQ here explained to the Press today the mechanics of the series of major offensives in western Saxony which have been taking place here since March 25th.

The master and executor of this series of offensives has been revealed to be the noted General Ludendorff, the fast-rising officer who started the war as a divisional commander.

The General Staff in Berlin refers constantly to the Saxon offensives as Ludendorff's Glorious Spring. The Austrians have deprecated this term, but this Spring has hardly been glorious for them.

General Ludendorff appeared for a short while in the middle of the session and added his own comments to those of his planners. Many table models were used, and it was pointed out that these table models themselves were originally used by the Army Group Staff to plan their drives.

Colonel Niess pointed out the problems of the General Staff in their attempt to break the Austrian war. "Not their lines, mind you, but to drive Austria completely out of the war, which remains our one really primary goal."

The Colonel showed us how the Austrians had spent the fall and Underlined moves do not succeed. The German Army Ukraine is routed and destroyed, since it has no available retreat. The Turkish Fleet Ionian's support of the French Fleet Tunis fails because the Tunisian Fleet is moving rather than holding.

in constructing a massive series of permanent installations in three to five general lines, one behind the other, to entrap and stymie any German-English counter-offensive.

"But by Spring, the Habsburgs had lost the initiative completely. The entire Belgian-Dutch frontier was handled by the English High Command. Their offensives about Aachen, St. Vith, Venlo, Kleves, Bastogne, Boechlt, Emmerich, Gronau, each became an increasingly unbearable series of body-blows to the western front which the Habsburgs could counter only by increasing their commitment to the Westerwald.

At the same time the French succeeded in capturing Milan in Italy, and St. Avold in Lorraine, putting them within long-range artillery distance of every town in the Saar. Each blow drained away Austrian reserves faster than they could train and replace their hordes of slavie and hungarian soldiery, After destroying their Grissen beach-head and the Torgau pincers, the Austrians could no longer mount a serious offensive even against the weakened German lines.

Now came more Englishmen. Empire troops now man German trenches west of Bielefeld, relieving whole Corps for decisive action elsewhere. Sir John French committed a Corps of six additional divisions of English, Indian, and Irish troops to the German General Staff for use as Staff reserve. Never before had such numbers of English soldiers been directly subordinated to a foreign command.

But on March 25th the result came. Twenty-four German divisions were thrown at twelve Austrian divisions along a 51 Kilometre front.

In ten days they had penetrated Estellung Helga, Estellung Tonya, and Estellung Friede to be finally stopped dead by the Austrian General Reserve. Then, on the 5th of April, twenty-one German and six English divisions assaulted the line Finster-Walde to Torgau.

Already bleeding from the open wound of the Leipzig bulge we had just punched, the Austrians almost proved incapable of the task of containing this fantastic offensive.

After seventeen days it too had run its course, after reaching the hard core of Estellung Marlene in front of Dresden.

On April 12th, Sir John French had attacked out of Munster and Bielfeld and taken Sternhaus Forest.

Then the climax was reached. Ten German divisions, the last remaining German reserve uncommitted, and four English divisions crossed the Helme River across from Nordhausen.

The Leipzig Bulge bled anew, and Gera was taken, the Eastern Army shed its blood before Chemnitz and Dresden... And the Habsburg lines cracked.

Two new divisions, composed of ex-naval personnel, crossed the Weser above Kassel, the British took Meissen, the Potsdam Guards entered Zwickau, the Prince of Hannover division penetrated Estellung Lori near Weimar, and Prague, the suburb of Warsaw east of Warsaw on the other side of the Vistula surrendered... all on May 7th.

The Kaiser ordered the bells in all of Germany rung, hailing forth that on this day truly was the Reich saved.

This is the situation then, today. We hold Fulda, Donausworth, Nuremberg, Eger in Bohemia, the suburbs of Chemnitz and Dresden, Wurzburg, Ansbach, the border of Bohemia north of the Pilzen-Nuremberg road, Hersfeld and Kassel in Hesse, in fact most of Franconia and all of Thuringia.

It is enough for now. A war is not won in a day, gentlemen. The Habsburg has despreately reinforced the entire line. But the plains of southern Bavaria lie open to us now, Frankfurt is only 42 kilometres from our forward lines, and the Russian is rapidly collapsing ever more swiftly.

Naturally I cannot tell you where we strike next. But now it is our decision as to where the quiet trenches will again erupt. I think you will know when we make our next step."

With that Ludendorff and Niess left the room. We stared at the model tables for a little while and I toyed with some of the marvellous miniature batteries and pillboxes and railroad trains on their toy lines. Nowhere on the great tables did I see 440,000 dead Germans and Englishmen, and 317,000 dead Austrians, or the estimated two million wounded on both sides. In five months holocaust had come to a land, a whirlwind of proportions never before reached in the history of man. From the French-Belgian border to the steppes of Russia, a continent is bleeding itself to death ever faster and faster.

All I saw were pretty tables with neat but dusty displays, some of the cannon and bridges broken. Someone had cut himself on some wire imbedded in the models. It was the only blood I saw today.

WASHINGTON, D.C. (DWE) President Theodore Roosevelt, acquitted of the assassination of President McKinley, today announced that the United States would enter the European War on behalf of Italy. He was seemingly undisturbed when informed that there was no longer an Italian Government. "We will make an Italian Government!" the President shouted. "And then we will help it."

ENGLAND: no moves received.

No countries in 1964D submitted moves for Winter 1910. This affected only England, who had one build coming. Contrary to the announcement last Fall, Turkey did not need to remove one unit, since it had had an army annihilated in the Fall maneuvers.

Underlined moves do not succeed. The routed English Army Norway and the routed Russian Fleet Rumania are destroyed, having no open retreat. CONSTANTINOPLE (DWE) Gunther Schuller, speaking for his illustrious majesty the Sublime Emperor John Lewis today calmed excited officials worried about the repercussions of certain incidents involving the Austrians and the Russians. Schuller merely pointed out that unless the Russians resented the destruction of their southern navy, and unless the Austrians got hot about the naval battle in the Aegean, there would be no further hostilities on anyone's part but the Turks'. "That's the way we like it," leered Schuller.

The following five-man game was played under the YUDC special short-man variation, which allows players to select their country at random from a full field of all seven countries. The remaining Great Powers, unpicked by the four, five, or six players, have one army placed in each of their provinces (not merely in their supply centers). These countries are declared neutrals, but have considerably more defensive power than the standard neutrals. The standing armies in their provinces remain until forcibly removed, no matter how many supply centers are taken from the country involved.

ENGLAND: Kim Pattee
FRANCE: John Engardner
AUSTRIA: Ovilla Pattee
RUSSIA: John Koning

Spring 1801: Before the first moves, England and France agreed to a non-aggression pact so that they might carve up their respective parts of Germany and Italy. France and Austria agreed to aid each other in removing Italian units. Austria, Russia, and Turkey agreed to watchful non-aggression. Turkey secretly wooed Austria to join an anti-Russian pact, while Russia pushed the same goal with Austria against Turkey.

Fall 1801: Enmity grew between Russia and Turkey over the Black Sea. Each continued to seek Austrian support, the Turks pointing to the Russian army in Galicia. The placing of that army had, however, already been agreed to by the Austrians. England and Russia agreed to a peaceful division of the North. England and Austria secretly divided up Germany.

Italian Armies Rome and Apulia, and German Army Prussia routed and destroyed. It was a victory for Turkish diplomacy, if nothing else, for the Fleet Black Sea made Ankara without opposition... the only way it could have made port. The Turkish support from Armenia is listed as failing because it supported an impossible move.

Russia sent a note to Turkey, stating "The pressure is too great. Alliance with Turkey?" Turkey enthusiastically agreed. Russia had hoped that Austria's usual move would be repeated, and he could take Greece. His move to Sweden was in anticipation of an English attack when he struck as England's ally Austria. England disclaimed any desire to fight.

Fall 1805: England expected an attack from Russia, but preferred to act defensively rather than predipitate an unnecessary war. The Turkish Army Smyrna, contrary to the order above, retreated to Syria.

Winter 1806: Russia at this point decided to attack England rather than Austria, although an attack on one might have meant an attack on both.

ENGLAND: Builds A London

FRANCE: Removes A Ruhr, A Naples

AUSTRIA: No change

RUSSIA: Builds A Warsaw, F St. Petersburg (NC)

TURKEY: Removes A Smyria

At this point the game was discontinued. It was conceded that if Austria and Russia continued to play together, which was likely, it would merely be a contest over who could build the fastest. With France fighting England, and Austria and Russia also hitting her, and France being cut up by Austria in the south, the end was inevitable. A French-English alliance would have forstalled this, but probably not prevented it.

At games end, the distribution of centers was as follows:

ENGLAND: Lon, Liv, Edin, Hol, Bel, Den, Nor, Kiel, Ber, Por, Spa ((11))

FRANCE: Par, Bre, Mar, Nap, Rome ((5))

AUSTRIA: Tri, Vie, Bud, Ser, Gre, Ven, Mun ((7))

RUSSIA: StP, Mos, War, Sev, Swe, Rum, Bul, Ank, Con, Smy((10))

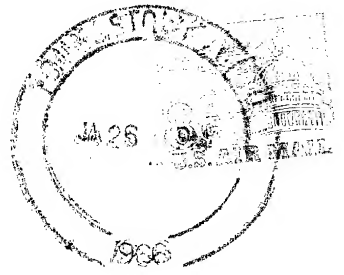

It was also obvious to those playing that a better-handled France would have given England a rougher time; that the Austrian-Russian campaign against Turkey would have been greatly facilitated if either Austria had brought her other fleet into play, or Russia had dropped back from Sevastapol in 1904 and built a second fleet there. A more active role on Austria's part would also have changed things considerably.. had this not been a "Get Smythe" day, the game might have followed different lines.

Other five man games with the same countries playing will follow. Watch for them!
